The first public lectures in anatomy were given, so it is said, by Dr. William Hunter of Newport, R. I., in 1752. It seems, however, that Dr. Giles Firmin as early as 1647 gave readings on human osteology in New England; that Dr. Thomas Cadwallader of Philadelphia gave instruction to students in anatomy between 1745 and 1751, and that Drs. John Bard and Peter Middleton dissected the human body in New York in 1750 for purposes of medical instruction. In 1762 Dr. William Shippen of Philadelphia commenced the course of instruction which culminated in the organization of the Medical College of Philadelphia (now the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania) in 1765. One other medical school was organized during the colonial period, King's (now Columbia) in 1768. At the time of the Revolution there were about 3,500 practitioners in the colonies, but only about 400 of these had received medical degrees, and the holders of these were mostly educated abroad.

Harvard University Medical School was organized in 1782, Dartmouth Medical College in 1807, the School of Medicine of the University of Maryland and the College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York in 1807. In 1813 the medical department of King's (the name of which had been changed to Columbia) College was finally discontinued. The College of Physicians and Surgeons became in 1800 the medical department of Columbia University. Of the 156 medical schools now existing in the United States 3 were established between 1765 and 1800, 12 between 1801 and 1825, 22 between 1826 and 1850, 33 between 1851 and 1875, 86 between 1876 and 1900.

At the time of the organization of the early medical schools the practice of obstetrics was relegated as a rule to ignorant midwives; physiology, histology, organic chemistry, pathology and surgery, as now recognized, were hardly known. The school at first conferred the degree of bachelor of medicine on those who had studied two years with a preceptor and attended one course of lectures, the degree of doctor of medicine after three years of study and two courses of lectures. The bachelor's degree was abandoned in 1813. At first the Medical College of Philadelphia required some preparatory work before entrance, but this was abandoned in 1792. For one hundred years entrance to schools of medicine was unhampered by educational instructions.

The renaissance of medical education in America really commenced about a decade ago, though the ground had already been broken by pioneers, like the Chicago Medical College and the Harvard Medical School. It was undoubtedly due most to the growth of the scientific spirit and the feeling that physicians should be more liberally educated, but the desire for higher standards was encouraged by the medical societies and fostered by appropriate legislation. The following societies were influential in bringing about this change: The American Institute of Homeopathy (organized 1844); the Association of American Medical Colleges (1890); National Confederation of Eclectic Medical Colleges (1871), and the Southern Medical College Association (1892).

For many years the method of instruction pursued by all medical colleges in the United States consisted in attendance upon two courses of lectures, lasting five months each, in succeeding years—the two courses being identical. Little or no laboratory or clinical instruction (except dissection) was given. The first to change this was the Chicago Medical College, now the medical department of Northwestern University, which, in 1859, introduced a graded course, three years in length, each course being six months in duration. Clinical and laboratory work was added to the curriculum and was made obligatory. In 1871 the Harvard Medical School adopted a similar plan, which was soon followed by the Syracuse Medical School.

The latest complete data we have concerning the number of and attendance upon medical schools is for 1899. In this year there were, excluding graduate schools, 156 medical schools in the United States with 24,119 students. The growth in medical students in 21 years has been 142 per cent. Of the 156 schools 125 are regular(a) (21,619 students), 21 homeopathic (1,833 students), 7 eclectic (582 students) and 3 physio-medical (85 students). Of the 156 medical schools, 185 hold day sessions, 5 have evening sessions, 9 have both and 7 do not report this item. 74 are departments of colleges or universities, 82 are separate institutions. 152 grant degrees. In addition to the undergraduate schools there are 8 graduate medical schools which had in 1898 624 instructors and 1,813 students, of whom 59 were women. In 1899 these schools had 1,916 students, of whom 73 were women. Nearly half of the students were in the New York schools.

The ratio of physicians to population is less than 1 to 600 in the United States, while in foreign countries it varies from 1 to about 1,100 in the British Isles to 1 to about 8,500 in Russia. We are said to have in proportion to our population four times as many physicians as France, five times as many as Germany, six times as many as Italy.

There are more medical schools in the United States alone than in countries whose total population is six times as great.

The tendency of the times is toward the raising of the standards in our medical. At present, with a very few exceptions, attendance upon at least four courses of study of at least six months each in a recognized medical college is required. In most of the states this is necessary for admission to practice.

The status of medical schools, while determined in part by the ruling of state boards of health or medical examiners, as in Illinois and New York, is generally fixed by the associations of the organized medical educating bodies. The largest of these bodies is the Association of American Medical Colleges, representing the regular institutions. This association has made the following requirements:

1. After July 1, 1900, and till more stringent rules be adopted, students beginning the study of medicine must possess a diploma from a high school giving a thorough preliminary education, or must pass a thorough examination in all the branches usually taught in such schools. This examination is to be conducted by a state superintendent of public instruction or some one delegated by him, or by members of the faculty of a university or college, who are not connected with the medical faculty of the school the student wishes to enter, or by such a body as the regents of the University of the State of New York.

2. Before a student can enter an advanced class he must present certificates from a school whose requirements fully equal those of this association of having successfully passed the examinations in at least three-fifths of the branches embraced in the curriculum of the previous years of the school he desires to enter, or he must pass examinations on the same; on the remaining branches he may be conditioned, but these conditions must be removed by taking the work, providing it has not already been taken, and by passing examinations before he can pass on to the succeeding class (that is a man shall not carry conditions for more than one year), providing, however, that this shall not prevent schools from allowing students who have earned the B. A. or B. S. degree and who have had an adequate course in science, or graduates in dentistry or pharmacy, who possess the proper preliminary education, to enter the sophomore class.

3. Before a student can be eligible for the degree of doctor of medicine he must have attended in a well-equipped medical school, four courses of lectures of at least six months each. These courses must embrace at least 3300 hours' actual work in the school, including besides didactic lectures and recitations,

- (a) 500 hours of laboratory work;
- (b) 150 hours of practical work;
- (c) One or more obstetric cases personally attended by each student.

- (d) 750 hours of clinical teaching.

At least 45 months must intervene between a student's matriculation and the date of his graduation. All of the work should be fairly apportioned throughout the four years.

4. No school can be considered capable of giving the requisite instruction that can not command each year at least 3000 hospital or dispensary patients for presentation to its classes.

The requirements of the American Institute of Homeopathy and the National Confederation of Eclectic Medical Colleges are in the main the same as those given above.

The present period is one of great activity in our medical institutions. The requirements for admission are being constantly raised and their courses amplified in such a way as to put the best of them, at least, in the front rank among technical institutions. The four year course is an established fact; but the sessions of six months each are being increased to eight or nine. Already several schools are planning to lengthen the course to five years of nine months each.

Another good sign is the material prosperity of our schools. Within the year several large endowments have been provided for medical instruction; and magnificent laboratories and other buildings are being provided in order to furnish increased facilities for instruction and research work. The Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research opens up an enormous field for medical investigation where our brighter men can carry on post-graduate instruction. The future is indeed a promising one.
