

PART IV. Medical Societies.

There is no better evidence of the activity of medical thought in any country than the condition of its medical societies. Measured by this standard the medical profession of America has every reason to feel a sense of satisfaction with the present and encouragement for the future. It is true that for many years the membership of many of the state and local organizations of the United States has increased but slowly and that it still represents but a fraction of the professional strength. But a change for the better is already to be seen and the growth of the past year has been particularly gratifying.

This growth is due to several causes. The first undoubtedly is that the new-birth of medicine must find expression and the societies are the natural means for the public interchange of ideas; second, the societies are being reorganized on a business basis and managed by men of marked executive ability.

The most important step of recent years was taken at the last meeting of the American Medical Association, held at St. Paul, Minnesota, last June. At this meeting a system of reorganization was submitted by a committee appointed the year before, and was adopted. This plan provides for a complete reorganization of the business section of the association which is now vested in a House of Delegates of not more than 150 members, to consist of delegates from the state and territorial societies in affiliation with the Association, the number from each society being apportioned according to its numerical strength; also delegates from the scientific sections of the Association and from the medical departments of the Army, Navy and Marine Hospital service. The House of Delegates shall transact the business of society, but its acts may be made subject to a referendum to the General Sessions, upon demand of the latter. The House of Delegates shall also select the officers of the Association.

The underlying principle of this plan of organization is the knitting together of the state societies into a strong unit, those societies likewise to stand on the same relation to the country organizations. When this is perfected the result will be a powerful medical federation of county, state and national organizations, enabling the medical profession to act as a unit, thereby enormously increasing its value and influence and enabling it to secure the passage and enforcement of much needed legislation. To facilitate the perfection of this organization it was recommended:

"a. That each state society shall at the earliest possible moment appoint a 'Committee on Organization,' to which shall be referred, with the Association's endorsement, the report of your committee, and especially that part which refers to state and county societies.

"b. That each state society immediately raise funds and employ an organizer to organize the profession in its territory.

"c. That the state societies unitedly agree to federate themselves in the American Medical Association, and as a preliminary to this adopt a uniform organic law in regard to certain fundamental principles, viz., to divide their annual meeting into two branches, legislative and scientific; the legislative branch to be as small as is compatible with representation from all the county societies, and to be composed of delegates elected by the county societies.

"d. That membership in the county or district societies shall constitute membership in the respective state society without further dues, and that no one be admitted to membership in the state society except through county or regular district societies.

"e. That funds to meet the expenses of the state society be raised by a per capita assessment on the county and district societies.

"f. That a united effort be made to influence special societies to limit their membership to those who support the regular organization, and the semi-national and miscellaneous societies to encourage systematic organization, by covering a definite territory and also by limiting their membership to supporters of the regular organization.

"g. That each state society create a permanent committee and a fund for the purpose of enforcing all medical laws in every part of its territory.

"h. That each state society co-operate with the American Medical Association and with the other state societies in solving the problem now before the profession relating to medical education, medical legislation, reciprocity, licensing, etc."

This plan is now being vigorously carried into effect in all parts of the country. It has been submitted by the officers of the Association to every state society, which are generally taking up the work as rapidly as possible.

In other portions of the North American continent the medical profession is well organized. The Canadian Medical Association is doing excellent work and the same may be said of the Mexican and Central American organizations. Physicians of these countries have been very active in the work of the great national and international medical societies. The outlook, all over the continent, is a most hopeful one.
